William Richardson of Brooklyn, New York, who at present is a guest of the Knutsford, is one of the most experienced street railway men in this country. On the organization of The Atlantic Avenue Railroad company of Brooklyn in 1872, he was elected president of the corporation and held that office until 19, 1893, when he resigned. The cause of his resignation was the selling of a controlling interest in the road to a syndicate composed of bankers E. W. Clark and Company of Philadelphia, J. and W. Seligman and H. B. Hollins and Company of New York and some others, but he still retains an advisory place in its board of management.

Mr. Noble called attention to the brick on the table, and opined that as it was sent in with the bid, it was a part of the bid, and if better brick were required, the city would have to pay more for them, that was all. Mr. Noble expressed himself emphatically to the effect that the concrete called for by the specifications was not strong enough.

Mr. Clawson said that it this conference had taken place when the inspectors were appointed, this one would have been unnecessary. He believed that some brick had been used that were not right up to the standard and there were some other defects which, although trifling in themselves, were serious in the aggregate.

Doremus received a polite scorening item some of the contractors that he will remember for some time.

Mr. Conklin's motion was then put and carried, and Elias Morris gave the board a talk on brick and cement, which certainly enlightened them somewhat on plaints made by the engineer and hear what the inspectors might have to say
